A lot to catch up on

By Doug Roles, Vice President, Member Services

HAVING returned to Valley REC recently from a year-long military deployment, I've been catching up on exciting changes at the co-op. It seems change was the constant with our products, programs and services in the last 12 months.

I appreciate the co-op's support of my service with the Pennsylvania Army National Guard and the assistance I've received since returning to work, but I admit it's taken a while to get back up to speed. A lot happened in 2018!

Our president and CEO, Rich Bauer, provided members with an update on co-op happenings during February's series of nominating meetings (See story on next page). His reports to members also gave me a chance to get caught up. In case you missed it, here are some of the highlights:

Last summer, we mailed four-packs of LED lightbulbs to all our members, a first. Did you know replacing 60-watt incandescent bulbs with equivalent LEDs will cut the cost of lighting in an average home from $260 per year to just $26? That's a huge savings, for you and for the co-op's wholesale power bill.

The co-op's line crews in Shade Gap built a hot line demo trailer last year. It was used at two PennDOT safety events in the fall. The mobile trailer gives us the ability to bring the safety presentation right to your school or civic group.

Following a year of construction, and then moving supplies and equipment, our new Martinsburg office opened in January. Our new building is along Cove Mountain Road, just east of Martinsburg.

And Valley REC Energy Services, the electrical contracting arm of the co-op, began offering the GenerLink transfer switch last spring. These meter-mounted switches allow your portable generator to safely power your breaker box during an outage.

Late last year, Valley decided to change its billing cycle to more evenly distribute workload for our consumer service folks. Instead of billing everyone on the first of the month, we're now mailing bills by service district, starting with January's statements.

Also in 2018, after broadening our Youth Tour program, we had several students of non-member households attend. What a great experience for them! And it helps us spread the electric cooperative story to families that don't live on our lines.

It's bittersweet that the face(s) of the co-op are changing too, as a number of veteran employees moved on to well-deserved retirements. See page 14d for our farewell to a co-op communicator who retired last summer. Many readers will remember Valley's former vice president of consumer services and public relations, Luanne Eckenrode, either from her stories and photos in Penn Lines, her electrical safety presentations, or her involvement in civic groups and activities — not to mention a 30-year run of staffing the co-op's booth at county fairs.

Luanne was fond of the phrase "sea change" to describe rapid progress and new developments at the co-op. Looks like we were awash in change in 2018. ☀

Co-op holds nominating meetings in Districts 7, 8 & 9

By Doug Roles

Vice President, Member Services

IN FEBRUARY, Valley REC held nominating meetings in co-op Districts 7, 8 and 9. The nominees shown on the following page were selected to stand for election to the co-op board of directors at the annual meeting to be held Friday, April 5, at Huntingdon Area High School.

The meetings were held in Hustontown, Fulton County; Shade Gap, Huntingdon County; and Hollidaysburg, Blair County. Following the meal, VREC President & CEO Rich Bauer provided an update to the members on their cooperative. A question-and-answer period provided members an opportunity to raise concerns or get more information about a specific topic.

Rich thanked members for their cooperation with the co-op's rights-of-way trimming program. He said Valley maintains an aggressive vegetation management program.

"It's probably one of the most important things we do to keep the power on," Rich said. "We do it on a five-year cycle."

As usual at nominating meetings and the annual meeting, Rich thanked members for their participation in the co-op's demand response program. He asked members who don't have a demand response unit to consider having the water heater switch installed to help lessen the co-op's electricity use during periods when demand is greatest. On average, each water heater switch saves about $57 annually on the co-op's power bill.

"In 2018, we installed an additional 460 DRUs," Rich said. "The DRU total is 5,526, more than 25 percent of the membership. Most people say, 'We forget it's even there.'"

Rich also explained the co-op's new billing cycles. The old method of billing all accounts on the first of the month inundated the consumer services department with bill processing tasks. The new method of billing accounts by service district spreads out the workload.

Rich also noted that the co-op is now accepting applications for the Brighter Future scholarship program and is interviewing students for the annual Youth Tour to Washington, D.C. He reported the Community Service Grant Program handed out $66,000 in assistance to civic projects and members struggling with bill payments due to hardships. The grant program is funded through unclaimed capital credits refunds.

Rich reported Valley REC Energy Services is now in its third year. The new service specializes in small electrical jobs — such as security lighting, breaker replacement and water heater installation — that don't prove economically feasible for many local contractors.

"Our goal was to do the smaller jobs that a lot of electrical contractors don't do," Rich said.

Questions from members ranged from the mix of power sources the co-op uses to paperless billing to trimming of trees along service drops. Members were given an LED night light as a token of our appreciation for their attendance. 🌟

Valley staffer looks forward to retirement filled with family, travel

By Doug Roles

Vice President, Member Services

LUANNE ECKENRODE was introduced to Valley REC members in a Meet Your Employees column in the December 1988 issue of Penn Lines magazine. As the co-op's new manager of member services and public relations, a good portion of Luanne's role as a co-op communicator for the next 30 years focused on using the co-op's local pages of Penn Lines to tell the Valley Rural Electric story.

Luanne retired as Valley's vice president of consumer services and public relations in July. The start and end of her co-op journey are vastly different.

"I knew nothing about the rural electric cooperative program," she recalls. "I thought everyone in the state was on Penelec."

Luanne was happily working for Mount Aloysius Junior College in Cresson, in alumni relations and fundraising, when a friend showed her an employment ad that looked like a good fit. Hired into a position that had been vacant for several months, Luanne's first challenge was to learn what her predecessor had done in the role and then to roll with the changes as the scope of her duties expanded.

Luanne and then-General Manager Doug Smith crafted the position to use Luanne's background in journalism and public speaking to focus on electrical and safety programs, and updating the co-op's publications — the long-running bi-monthly Valley News newsletter and the co-op's pages in Penn Lines.

Luanne says she learned a great deal about electric distribution and safety from the co-op's linemen while educating herself on electric cooperative products, programs, and services. She especially enjoyed meeting members and hearing their stories.

"That was all really exciting for me," she says. "I became a believer. I like the co-op concept. I was impressed with Valley's attention to the consumer. It was easier to do my job as a journalist when I believed in what we were doing."

Luanne experienced what she calls "sea change" in the way Valley REC communicated its message to members. Early on, typewriters were still in use. Layouts were done by hand and photo prints — developed at the co-op and later at photo processing centers — were mailed to the printer with the articles. The last step was waiting on the printer to send back proofs. Fax machines eventually sped up the process as did getting a computer.

"Things changed dramatically after that with digital photography and using the computer for more than word processing," Luanne says. "It's hard to imagine how we did the work back then."

Luanne's first article for Penn Lines was on auctioneer Dale Gibboney, then serving on the Valley REC board of directors. Her first piece for Valley News, in the January/February 1989 issue, featured the Globe Run Farm owned by the John A. Foster family.

Luanne oversaw the co-op's Brighter Future Scholarship program, participation in county fairs and the annual Youth Tour to Washington, D.C., and started the practice of serving meals to increase attendance at district nominating meetings. Hot line safety demos, participation in civic groups on behalf of the co-op, and development of a safety education program for firefighters created some long days in the office and on the road as Luanne lived the co-op principle of concern for community.

Luanne had a goal of using her undergraduate work in English and graduate studies in communication arts in the publishing industry in Manhattan. She says she never expected to stay at the co-op but says variety kept her work at Valley interesting.

"In the last decade of my career, they expanded my role to supervise what was then office services and billing, what was renamed consumer services," she says.

At the same time, a new position of energy specialist was created within the member services department. And the co-op entered the digital communications age with a website and later a social media presence.

"There was a lot of change," she says. "We built several substations, moved to the current corporate office and moved the Huntingdon District office to what had been the Shaner Energy building."

Her tenure also saw the construction of the current Shade Gap District office and the start of the newly-opened Martinsburg District office. Luanne says she enjoyed the various stages of her career, particularly the early years when she was crafting her position and making the job her own.

"Those were fun years because of all the learning and feeling like you could try new things," she says. "All the way through, I felt blessed to work with tremendous people, very dedicated people at Valley REC and at other co-ops, who were doing what was right for the business and the consumers."

Luanne and her husband, Jim, would like to purchase property in North Carolina and live there year-round but would be snowbirds initially because of family commitments. The last two years have seen the wedding of their oldest daughter, Jamie, and the arrival of a grandson, Dominic. Their younger daughter, Caroline, will be heading off to Penn State Altoona this fall.

Luanne hopes to pursue her passion for scenic photography and to take a class in photo matting. She has been greatly involved in her church and community, particularly with the Morrisons Cove Memorial Park, and plans to continue volunteering.

If the circumstances were right, she may go back to "work." Luanne has long thought that a dream retirement job would be serving as a tour guide.

"I think that would be fun," she says. "I like to travel and I like to talk with people." 🌞
